Subject: Fwd: Sandra Lyon Comments again blaming the EPA and DTSC for lack of action and "safe" schools

Dear Steve, Tom and Patrick:

I just wanted to keep you all in the loop of what Sandra Lyon (superintendent) is telling the public in the latest article (and at the board meetings). She is putting the blame on your agencies for not moving this along, which we both know is not the case and you are waiting for Environ/district. She is also stating that the EPA and DTSC has stated, based on the limited a testing done to date that has no scientific bases for which rooms were tested that would give an accurate assessment for the entire school, that the entire school is safe.

What do you think?

Best Regards,
Jennifer

"We understand that this hasn't moved at a pace that people like, but it hasn't been off our radar at all," she said. "We're also at the whim of the EPA and the DTSC's timetables."

"We have consistently said we [members of the District] are not the experts, but that we're working with the experts," Lyon said. "All we've said is that according to the EPA and those experts, those schools are safe to occupy."

Lyon, however, said the District is basing its judgement that Malibu schools are safe to occupy upon input it received from the Environmental Protection Agency and the California Department of Toxic Substances Control.
